Testimony to the Management-Labor Advisory Committee of DCBS

Kate Suisman of NW Workers' Justice Project

July 2, 2020

Good Morning members of the Committee.

My name is Kate Suisman. I am an attorney at the Northwest Workers' Justice Project in Portland. We are a non-profit law firm that helps low-wage workers in employment matters. A large majority of our clients are immigrants. NWJP handles many cases of workers' compensation retaliation, and I myself have litigated many of these claims.

Even before the pandemic, I have seen workers' claims denied because they cannot prove their injury is work-related. More and more often, we hear from workers who are told that an underlying condition, such as arthritis, is the true cause of their injury, despite doing repetitive manual labor for their employer for years. It is even more difficult for workers try to prove causation of an infectious or occupational disease.

In reviewing data provided by DCBS regarding "Oregon workers' compensation COVID-19 related claims through Jun 22, 2020," it is clear certain workers are not filing workers' compensation claims, although they almost surely contracted the virus at work. I will submit this data with my testimony. This data shows a total of 441 COVID-related claims, of which 126 were denied, which is a 28.6% denial rate. The vast majority of claims, and nearly all of the accepted claims, come from the health care and nursing home sectors. Of the 37 claims clearly identifiable as non-health care / nursing home, there is a denial rate of 73%. (These numbers do not include accepted, non-disabling claims.)

Contrast this with the weekly Oregon Health Report dated June 24, 2020, which indicates 60% of the 1,118 workplace infections that it has tracked in larger employers are happening in agricultural and food processing workplaces like Pacific Seafood, Duckwall Fruits, Townsend Farms and others. (This number includes persons linked to the outbreak, which may include household members and other close contacts, so not all these cases are workers, but it provides a sense of scope of the concentration of workplace infections in certain industries.)

Yet, only 2 food processing workers have made WC claims, both of which were denied, and no agricultural workers have made claims as of DCBS's June 22nd data. (1 claim at Bob's Red Mill was accepted.) This is in stark contrast to Oregon Health Authority workplace outbreak reports.

I understand there can be up to 75 days lag time in claims being reported to WCD. But even in the "resolved" workplace cases per OHA, about half of the reported cases are in food processing and agriculture. Also anecdotally, Townsend Farms workers began calling our office in early May regarding an April outbreak (about 70 days ago) and there appear to have been no claims filed to date. It is possible we will see claims filed eventually from this first outbreak at Townsend Farms but I believe that is very unlikely due to the high level of fear these workers express to us and other community partners. I discuss retaliation further below.

This data shows that outside of the health care and nursing home sectors, front line or essential workers are not filing workers compensation claims when they contract COVID. These are "missing" claims that should have been filed. I think there are a number of reasons these claims are missing, including:

Fear of retaliation. This is especially true for low-wage workers like temporary workers and many immigrant workers. NWJP's clients know that making a comp claim almost always leads to losing your job. It should not, but it does. Frequently, our clients are told "there is no more work for you" when they return to work after an injury. Further, many workers' compensation settlements involve a worker giving up their job. This is against everything the comp system is supposed to do- help a worker get better and return them to their job when they are healthy.

Retaliation is a huge, huge issue for our clients.

Fear of losing income. We are hearing that, for example, agricultural employees, who are dependent on the income that comes from short, intense seasonal work, are not reporting symptoms or exposure because they are scared that they will be quarantined without pay, when they feel well enough to work. Time-loss benefits are designed to allow employees to recover economically, but workers rightfully are worried that their comp claims will be denied and they can't take that risk economically.

Fear of entering into a new medical care setting. Many of our clients get health care from government-funded clinics such as Virginia Garcia. These clinics do not provide workers' compensation care. We believe many workers who believe they contracted COVID at work are afraid to enter the WC system because it means giving up their trusted, and often culturally-competent, medical care. Furthermore, it seems that medical providers, despite knowing that workers are contracting the disease at work, are often not assisting them in making the claims as they should.

Lack of education about when and how to file a claim. It is the employer's responsibility to file an injured worker's claim. Yet, I have heard many examples of employer's telling workers to report their injury as non-work related when they seek care or discouraging workers from seeking care at all.

What can MLAC do? Recommend a rebuttable presumption of workplace exposure related to COVID-19 to Governor Brown. Support legislation to punish retaliation such as the bill OTLA has described.

We all have an obligation to do our part to stop the spread of COVID in our communities. Strong action by MLAC to help protect workers will mean that more workers will feel safe reporting exposure and symptoms and will get testing and treatment. This will reduce exposure to other workers and slow the spread of the disease to the benefit of us all.

Thank you.
