The Office of Developmental Disabilities Services' main priorities are the safety, health and well-being of the people we serve and those who provide care for them.

We have information which indicates someone in your workplace has a medical diagnosis or directive to remain quarantined due to the COVID-19 virus or symptoms consistent with COVID-19. You may have been exposed to this virus while in your workplace, and ODDS feels it is our duty to report this information to you.

We encourage you to contact your healthcare provider to inform them of your potential exposure and seek their guidance. You may get a letter from your agency for your healthcare provider, informing them of the nature of your workplace. Oregon Health Authority testing guidelines recommends that people potentially exposed to COVID-19 who work in congregate settings be tested. If you are experiencing symptoms of COVID-19, including fever, tiredness, or a dry cough, do not risk exposing a person in services with an intellectual or developmental disability. Do not have in-person contact for at least 72 hours after your symptoms have gone away.

You may also wish to review the information that is available on the following websites:

We ask that you work with your supervisor should you need to take time away from work or for information regarding medical leave and support.

Thank you.
