Oregon is a sanctuary state

In Oregon, state and local government, including police are not allowed to help federal authorities enforce immigration law unless required by a court order.

What does that mean?

State agencies generally do not ask about a person's national origin or immigration status unless it is required for a specific service or program.

State agencies do not share personal information like your immigration status, home address, or work schedule with federal immigration authorities for the purpose of immigration enforcement unless required by a court order.
